- 1997 DVD/VHS Documentary Film 'Great Great Grandparents Music' produced and directed by Taali Laafi Rosselini, U.S. www.africanfamily.org/films/grandparents

Rising to prominence via his appearance, studying balafon, singing, dancing, and playing djembe in the award-winning Taali Laafi Rosselini epic documentary film (20 years in the making) 'Great Great Grandparents Music' featured young Dramane's musical education and vignettes of Dramane Koné's griot family life in west Africa. The film presents an intimate portrait of the remarkable Koné family, three generations of Jeli, West African musicians-singers-dancers and carriers of collective knowledge and culture.

About picture to the right: Dougoutigui Koné teaches his son Dramane, to play the bala xylophone. At age 4, Dramane already is speaking three languages: Bwamu, Jula and Moore.

Musicality

A master creator of rhythms, African singing and dancing performance, and highly proficient in the following instruments: djembe, dununs, balaphon/xylophone, guitar, kora (African string instrument), piano, drum set, n'tamani (small talking drum)

Nationality and Family Lineage

1999 Dramane became a naturalized American citizen, permanently residing in the U.S., while retaining citizenship in Africa's Burkina Faso.

Dramane is the son of well-known musical griot and master drummer Dougoutigui Koné. He is also the brother of notable griot and master drummer Mamadou Koné, and the two Koné brothers and their father played together in various traditional and popular music ensembles in Burkina Faso and elsewhere. Their griot lineage extends many generations.
